Many of the southern states that were conservative in allowing women the right to vote also did not ratify the Equal Rights Amendment for women in 1972, aimed at ending any remaining discrimination based on gender. The Amendment was given a seven-year deadline for passage, and by 1979 many states had not ratified the Amendment while others rescinded their ratification (marked with arrows). The proposal has been reintroduced unsuccessfully in every Congress since 1982.